The following articles are extracts from the Institute’s ed. book ‘Globalization, Economic Change and the Challenges of Caribbean Trade Unionism’, Trade Union Education Institute, University Printers, Jamaica, W.I (1998). Both articles speak to the stark situation facing Caribbean countries because of globalization, and the imperative for trade unions to transform their approach to secure the well being of workers. Copies of the book are on sale at the Institute at Ja$1,200.00/copy. For further information please contact the listed numbers or email address.

The Uncertain Future for Workers

Marva A. Phillips, Staff Tutor in Labour Education

Trade Union Education Institute

Workers in the Caribbean face a rapidly changing present and an unpredictable future. Changes in the international economy are affecting regional economies more quickly and more severely than at any other time in our history. For the last 50 years workers have played a role in the development of their economies. In the process workers have acquired certain rights and a well-defined place in the social structure. Contemporary economic forces however are forcing a rethinking of the role of trade unions and the way they are to fare the current changes.

Globalization and the Labour Movement

Comments from Professor Anthony Bogues

Extract from the ed. book ‘Globalization, Economic Change and the Challenges of Caribbean Trade Unionism’

I would like to suggest the following areas for consideration in the restructuring. First, I think and this might sound simple but it is of extraordinary importance there has to be a way of ending the competition between unions. In other words we have to develop a programme of unity at two levels; first, at the local level and then to develop a programme of common understanding and approaches at the regional level. The second element is to recognize that the ways in which we fight are in some instances outdated. Let me give an example. If a factory is being downsized or is being privatized we react to this sometimes as only a matter of saving jobs. This is necessary, but sometimes, indeed many times we have fought and won nothing. Should we not develop a new approach.

Globalisation and Trade Unionism

The trade union movement was born in this region in the early 20th century as an instrument of equality. The planter class in the early 1900’s did not treat the newly freed ex-slaves with respect and equality. The strikes and rebellions of the 1930’s were not only anti-colonial but were about equality. Over the years the trade union movement has perceived this task of equality as fighting for wages, better working conditions, benefits, arguing against unfair dismissal and a range of rights which would enable the working class to be treated with what one may call some amount of justice. The movement has not thought that it was important for us to examine economic policy, or to see how we could influence decisions at the workplace. Over time our perspective has become a defensive one. At the same time given the links between the political parties and the union movement, we traditionally depended upon the political party to make sure that our interests were represented in the political system.

While all of this has its place, today given the nature of the problems we face and given the context of globalization we have to find ways to ensure that we are able to properly represent workers. The restructuring of the global economic system means we have to restructure the labour movement to meet the new challenges.

Ms Marva Phillips and Mrs Jane Bennett of the School of Continuing Studies, Belize met with Ms Moya along with her Director of HR, Mr Dale Trujeque in February of this year on her visit to Belize to promote the offering of the Certificate in Labour Studies through institutions there.

Ms Moya’s response to the programme was extremely positive; it is her view that the programme is timely and that the University should make every effort to bring it on board. She is also willing to participate as a guest Lecturer within the programme. This offer is welcomed by UWI representatives as Ms Moya is knowledgeable in the field of Industrial Relations as a past Trade Union Leader and a Senior Manager in various government departments.
